Stand Your Ground or a License to Kill?

“Stand Your Ground” has become three words that mean two different things depending on who you are speaking to. To one group it can mean the difference between saving the life of yourself and your loved ones from a life threatening situation. And to some others it has come to be defined as shoot first and ask questions later. Also to some since the Zimmerman case feels it gives non-Blacks a license and legal loophole to shoot Black men. “Stand Your Ground” has become a way for some to target young Black men and in this case I feel it is a situation where it was a knee jerk reaction and the wrong action to take, also I feel that we have to get to a point where human life is worth more than property,” says Donald Chopin, a Community Activist with several organizations including VOTE, Safe Streets and the Peacekeepers. “It is time for a change in this law and an overall change in the way Black men are viewed by law enforcement and in the judicial process where we have rights that people are bound to respect and not continue to be treated unequally and as non-citizens or human beings.”

In a WWL-TV report legal experts were quoted as saying Louisiana has a very strong “Stand Your Ground” law that could come into play in this case. In the same report it quoted a neighbor Charles Hazouri who said, “All I know is that Merritt had told his family that he had said, ‘Freeze!’ and it looked like the guy turned at him and had his hand on his hip. Who knows!” While Zim- merman’s case and Merritt’s are different in many ways, the one thing they have in common is that if this case is to go to trial it will be a question of whether he acted in self-defense against Marshall Coulter.

According to the same report by WWL-TV, when speaking of the pending trial it was stated, “the police narrative in the arrest- ing documents says, ‘…the vic- tim made a thwarted move as if to reach for something.’” And that’s when Landry fired one shot, hitting Coulter in the head. “It’s re- ally gonna boil down to whether this shooting was done in self-de- fense,” said Loyola Law Professor Dane Ciolino. According to Cio- lino, that’s how Louisiana’s “Stand Your Ground” clause in that it does not require victims to retreat before using force, whether they’re inside their home or any other place they have a right to be.

“Stand Your Ground” is something used to promote vigilante justice, I feel this law is wrong and unfairly targets young Black men,” says Sophie Ashley, a young Activist who lives in the Marigny. “Also I feel that in general the Criminal Justice Sys- tem Black lives are devalued and the young men who’s the victim is placed on trial as opposed to the person who did the shooting as was the case with Zimmerman and even now where people are coming out in defense of Landry and demonizing Marshall Coulter which this is out of control in Marigny and all over the city forcing some of his friends to consider leaving because concerns about their safety.

It going to be a community united or will it descend into chaos?” This City is one that is racially divided and there is also a class divide and so many young people have no hope and lack of access to opportunities for upward mobility and turn to crime,” says Andrew, a resident of the Marigny who is an Educator and Activist. “Until a time comes where the structure of the system changes and there is more of an investment in young people who are disenfranchised things will not change unfortunately. I feel it is all of our respon- sibility to make sure all our kids have a chance at being a success in life.”

And while there are systematic societal problems, the solutions lie in the hands of the people who help shape the lives and values of young people. “I think these recent incidents should be a wake-up call to Black parents, be involved in your child’s life and know what’s going on with them because if they are in the wrong place at the wrong time there may be lethal consequences,” says Captain Black. All over the City not just in the Marigny neighborhood there is a crime wave that has many citi- zens of all backgrounds fearing for their safety. As violent crime

The St. Augustine High School (St. Aug) Board of Directors announces Oyd J. Craddock as the new President and Chief Executive Officer.

Mr. Craddock, a 1976 graduate of St. Augustine, spent 31 years at the IBM Corporation where he held executive roles in sales, marketing and operations with multiple roles being global in scope. Mr. Craddock is a graduate of Southern Illinois University, in Carbondale, Illinois, where he received a Bachelor of Arts degree in Business Administration. He received an MBA from the A.B. Freeman Graduate School at Tulane University in New Orleans, Louisiana.

“My plan for St. Aug is three-fold,” Mr. Craddock remarked. “First, we will continue to pursue excellence in every area, which is the St. Aug culture established by school founders. Second, we will ensure that curriculum standards and instruction reflect industry best practices, and prepare students for college, careers and life success in a global, highly technological world. Third, we will unify all St. Aug stakeholders to focus on what is best for the Purple Knight students. We must assess everything we do against how it positively impacts student achievement.”

During the course of his IBM career, Mr. Craddock spent thirteen years consulting school administrators and teachers on technology solutions. These solutions helped to improve student learning outcomes and staff productivity.

Daniel Davillier, chairman of the Board of Directors for St. Augustine High School, said that the Board and the Josephites are all excited to welcome Mr. Craddock back to St. Aug.

“As a product of St. Augustine High School, Mr. Craddock understands the high standards that we want for all Purple Knights. Mr. Craddock’s strong leadership and organizational skills will be a tremendous asset to our school,” Davillier stated.

Mr. Craddock is the husband of Annette Fortune Craddock, a 25-year educator with experience in teaching, administration and leadership. Mr. and Mrs. Craddock have two children, Koya and Oyd II.

Enshrine Voting Right in the Constitution

By Rev. Jesse Jackson, Sr
Founder & President, Rainbow PUSH Coalition

It was 48 years ago that President Lyndon Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act, announcing, “This right to vote is the basic right without which all others are meaningless. It gives people, as individuals, control over their own destinies.” With Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Rosa Parks at his side, he pledged that the act would be enforced. No longer would anyone be excluded from exercising the right to vote because of the color of his or her skin.

This February, in his fourth State of the Union address, a newly re-elected President Obama earned fierce applause when he declared: “We must all do our part to make sure our God-given rights are protected here at home. That includes one of the most fundamental rights of a democracy: the right to vote.”

Most Americans take this right for granted. Yet, as Justice Antonin Scalia emphasized in the Supreme Court’s shameful decision in Bush v. Gore, as it cut off counting the votes in Florida in the 2000 presidential election, the U.S. Constitution contains no right to vote for American citizens. The right to vote may be “God-given” and “fundamental,” as the president stated, but it is not protected in the U.S. Constitution.

Instead of a national standard, states determine the conditions of voting in federal as well as state elections. The result is a hodgepodge of conflicting and varying laws, some very restrictive, some more open. And instead of protected and guaranteed, the right to vote is a political battleground. A recent summary by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law reported that in 2013 (as of May 1), 82 bills that would restrict voting rights were introduced in 31 states. Seven states had already passed restrictive laws. After the conservative five-person majority in the Supreme Court weakened the Voting Rights Act in Shelby County v. Holder, another flurry of restrictive legislation was introduced from Texas to North Carolina.

At the same time, seven states have passed legislation expanding access to the polls for citizens. Some have same-day registration, early voting, online voting, allow felons who have paid their penalty to regain the right to vote. Others are making registration harder, requiring voter ID that discriminates against the old and the poor, restricting early voting, and excluding for life those who have served their sentences.

It’s time to enshrine this fundamental right in the Constitution and secure it with federal standards. Over 10 years ago, after the Bush v. Gore decision, my son Jesse Jackson Jr., joined with Rep. John Conyers and others to introduce a constitutional amendment guaranteeing the right to vote. In May, Reps. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.) and Mark Pocan (D-Wis.) came together to launch the effort once more with new legislation.

It’s easy to be cynical about the effort. Only 27 amendments have been added to the Constitution in our nation’s history. An amendment must win a daunting two-thirds majority of both the U.S. House and Senate, and then be ratified by three-fourths of the state legislatures. (It could also be adopted in a Constitutional Convention, but no amendment has gone that route.) This in a Congress that has a hard time assembling a majority to keep the government open.

But this is an effort that we must make. Because victory will be difficult, winning will elevate voting rights beyond the tides of partisan politics. The current state of our election system is an international disgrace, with restrictive election rules making it hard for working and poor people to vote in many states. Citizens are now forced to mobilize to defend their voting rights from Wisconsin to North Carolina.

Now, as we mark the anniversary of the Voting Rights Act, it’s time to make certain that the right to vote, the foundation of democracy, is defined and protected in our Constitution.

Hip Hop Connection

Hip Hop Turns 40

By Jineea Butler
NNPA Columnist

It’s hard to believe, but on August 11, Hip Hop will celebrate its 40th birthday. Yes, the big 4-0. It’s been for decades of creativity, invaluable efforts and love. Do you remember the doubters who said it wouldn’t last? They sure missed the mark.

Looking back, the DJ has been the most significant element in Hip Hop since its inception. Before the MC (Microphone Controller) became known as the rapper, the DJ led the way. You had DJ Kool Herc and the Hercules, Grandmaster Flash and the Furious Five, Afrika Bambaataa and the Universal Zulu Nation; It was the DJ who controlled the stage and it was he who introduced new talent to the party people.

In the years leading up to the Hip Hop explosion, the DJ had to take a back seat to the solo artist, commercialization and new technology. Hip Hop changed all of that and to honor that change, the DJs have banded together to reclaim their roles as Hip Hop’s most powerful voice.

August 9 – 12: The Core DJ’s are hosting Hip Hop’s biggest birthday party in Atlanta at the W Midtown Hotel with The Mixed Show Live 4.

What is so incredible about this event is that the Core DJ’s founder, Tony Neal, and his team have mastered the art of bottling opportunity, celebrity, business, networking and fun into one high-powered weekend just about every six months in a different city.

I was first introduced to the Core DJ’s in 2009 by industry veteran and marketing strategist Manny “Mad Dog” Ayala, who told me if I was serious about uniting Hip Hop’s entrepreneurs, I had to see what Tony Neal and the Core DJ’s were already doing. He explained that the DJ was no longer taking a back seat in Hip Hop. The DJ’s realized they were and had always been the gatekeepers to an artists’ success. Instead of just playing what is in rotation, they have the power to break new music and the Core DJ’s, representing the core of the country, work as one collective unit.

When I went to my first Core DJ retreat, now known as Mix Show Live, I was absolutely amazed. For the first time in my life, I saw what most thought was impossible: More than 500 progressive Hip Hop DJ’s, artists and entrepreneurs in a 4-Star hotel with nothing but love and business in the air. Not at the Core DJ’s. Not only is Tony Neal highly visible and accessible to the artists seeking advancement, he makes sure all the DJ’s in the Core, the panelist and the celebrity talent walk around with their nose stuck in the air. Not at the Core DJ’s. Not only is Tony Neal highly visible and accessible to the artists seeking advancement, he makes sure all the DJ’s in the Core, the panelist and the celebrity talent uphold the same honor and respect. I would never think that a man from Milwaukee could lead a charge so great, but in a candid conversation with Neal, he recalled that he thought of himself as a modern day civil rights leader.

The Sweetest Hallelujah

by Elaine Hussey

c.2013, Harlequin
$15.95 / $18.95 Canada
346 pages

Your best friend knows everything she needs to know. She knows your secrets, and the dreams you hold. She shores away your insecurities, your sorrows are her burdens, your joy is her triumph. Your best friend knows your heart, and loves you better for it. And in the new book “The Sweetest Hallelujah” by Elaine Hussey, a friendship that starts with a secret ends with a forever bond.

Dead Alice Watkins knew how to send a message to residents of Shakerag, Mississippi, on the north side of Tupelo.

When something bad was about to happen, everybody knew that Alice sent the odor of barbecue and notes from a blues harmonica around. Now, those things could be blamed on Tiny Jim’s barbecue house and jake joint, it was true, but most folks knew a warning when they smelled one.

And lately, ten-year-old Billie Hughes smelled barbecue a lot.

She tried not to think about it, however, even though she knew Mama was sick. That’s because Billie knew something Alice didn’t: if Billie could find her daddy, he’d fix everything. He was a famous musician in Memphis, and was surely rich. Billie figured he was kind of like Roy Rogers, only black.

Betty Jewel, Billie’s Mama, knew her daughter idolized the father she’d never met. Billie talked all the time about finding him, but Betty Jewel knew that Saint Hughes was no good. He ruined her life and her career. The only thing he’d ever give Billie was his last name.

Ten years after her husband, Joe, died, Cassie Malone still grieved deeply. Not one day went by without her missing his hugs, his laughter. She couldn’t bear to get rid of his clothes, or the empty crib for the babies they never had. She regretted most of all that they never had children. Three miscarriages still made her ache.

Which is maybe why the ad in the weekly paper caught her eye.

Desperate,” it said. “Dying woman seeks mother for her child.”

What would make a woman do that? Cassie had to know — though Lynchings and Jim Crow laws would make it dangerous to go out. So she left her well-appointed Tupelo house, and stepped right into a secret... I loved this book, but not for the story itself - which is wonderful and a little reminiscent of a certain Oscar-winning movie, only with a twist. I loved this book, but not for the exceptionally likeable characters. No, I loved “The Sweetest Hallelujah” because of the way author Elaine Hussey has written it.

With words that will make you weep and descriptions that put you directly in the scene, Hussey tells a tale of racism, understanding, and a mother’s love. There’s conflict in here, and maybe a bit of controversy; some Southern hospitality, and a haint that plays a surprisingly large part in the story.

It’s a beautiful novel. That’s all.

If your book group is in need of a great title, give them this one: “The Sweetest Hallelujah.” With that, they have everything they need to know.

Clergy, Civil Rights Leaders Meet For Talks On 50th Anniversary of March On Washington

By Ariel Medley
Special to the NNPA from the Afro-American Newspaper

Washington, D.C - Civil rights leaders, activists and clergy members gathered Aug. 1 inside the historic Metropolitan African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church (Metropolitan) on M Street in northwest Washington, D.C. to discuss a plan of action for the 50th Anniversary of the March on Washington.

Hosted by the National Action Network, the meeting served as both a briefing on the schedule of events for the August 24 remembrance of the march, and a preliminary discussion on how best to spread word of the march throughout communities nation-wide.

Janaye Ingram, D.C. Bureau Chief of the National Action Network, answered questions and provided details about what participants could expect on the day of the march. Marchers will arrive and gather around the reflecting pool at the Lincoln Memorial at 8 a.m. Musical selections, prayers, and speeches will take place at 9 a.m., and the main program will begin at 10 a.m.

The march will begin promptly at 1 p.m. with the procession leading down Independence Avenue and ending at the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial. Following the procession will be a Global Freedom Festival held between 2 p.m. to 7 p.m. on the National Mall.

“There is still a lot to fight for, focus on and change,” said Ingram. She emphasized the need for volunteers, calling on her audience to recruit members in their communities to fill volunteer positions on the day of the march. “We need volunteers for hospitality, for EMS, for transportation and for public relations. We especially need able-bodied men and women to help maintain order.”

With the march only three weeks away, the challenges now at hand are how best to spread the word about the march. Many communities nationwide still do not know about it.

“The key is collaboration, collaboration, collaboration, collaboration”, Bob Ross, president of the Prince George’s County branch of the NAACP, told the audience. He encouraged all to pass out flyers, talk to people in their communities and congregations, and to use social media sites to promote the event.

Civil justice supporter and native Washingtonian Phillip Brown, 30, spoke eloquently to audiences about the importance of reaching out to youth and including them in these discussions and events. “The youth out here want to be involved. They want to help but they don’t feel connected. They need guidance and leadership from their elders. We need to not be afraid to talk to them,” Brown said.

A second planning meeting at Metropolitan will be held Aug. 8 at 6:30 p.m., followed by a press conference on the steps of Metropolitan on Aug. 13 at 11 a.m. For more information on the 50th Anniversary for the March on Washington, visit http://nationalactionnetwork.net/mow/.

Inscription Removed from MLK Memorial

by Dorothy Rowley
Special to the NNPA from The Washington Informer

Washington, DC - A controversy on the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the National Mall has been removed by its sculptor.

“The youth out here want to be involved. They want to help but they don’t feel connected. They need guidance and leadership from their elders. We need to not be afraid to talk to them,” Brown said.

The removal was launched after many people voiced concern about the inscription on the side of the towering figure which read, “I was a drum major for justice, peace and righteousness.”

The inscription, however, is a paraphrase of comments King delivered at Atlanta’s Ebenezer Baptist Church in 1968, two months before he was killed. King actually stated, “If you want to say that I was a drum major, say that I was a drum major for justice, peace and righteousness.”

“The difficulty is the new striaions — so they won’t damage the integrity of the statue itself,” Lei said, adding that the new carvings are unlikely to cause any cracks in the statue.

“It’s not a big problem because the striaions are designed to appear on the sides,” he said. “If it has some cracks, we could deal with them.”

The celebration, which is being sponsored by several civil rights organizations, is expected to attract thousands of people from across the country, culminating with a commemoration of the 50th anniversary of King’s “I Have A Dream” speech, which he delivered Aug. 28, 1963 on the Mall.

Are you always asking “Why am I so tired?” Are you having trouble staying awake during watching your evening TV shows? Most of us know what it’s like to be tired, especially when we have a cold, flu, or some other viral infection. But when you suffer from a constant lack of energy and ongoing fatigue, it may be time to check with your doctor.

Fatigue is a lingering tiredness that is constant and limiting. With fatigue, you have unexplained, persistent, and relapsing exhaustion. It’s similar to how you feel when you have chronic fatigue, you may wake sleeping if you’ve had any coffee or tea just to feel “normal.” And the need for several cups of coffee or even hundreds—of times in a single night. Sleep apnea can also potentially result in low energy levels. People who eat meat can still suffer from low iron as well, especially if they skip on whole—some—though sometimes unappealing—foods like spinach, organ meats, and eggs. Women in particular are prone to anemia because of menstruation, as heavy periods can easily lead to anemia in combination with a low-iron diet.

It’s important to check with your doctor if you’re worried about fatigue. It can be a signal of something serious, like sleep apnea, a cold, flu, or some other viral infection. But when you suffer from fatigue, it may be time to speak with your doctor.

1. You drink too much coffee
If you rely on caffeine to get through your day, you can develop a dependence—so without it you can go into withdrawal, needing several cups of coffee or tea just to feel “normal.” And the worst point of withdrawal? Right in the morning. To make matters worse, caffeine can still course through your system when you’re sleeping if you’ve had any coffee or tea in the evening, which can interfere with normal REM sleep and leave you feeling even more tired. An easy solution is to cut back on the amount of caffeine you consume during the day and steer clear of caffeinated beverages within hours of your bedtime.

2. You don’t eat breakfast
There’s a reason that breakfast is called the most important meal of the day, and everyone has told you not to forget it—from your doctor to your mother, to probably every teacher you’ve ever had. And yet so many of us still skip it on a regular basis, or just cram down a few pieces of toast before heading out the door. Take the time to fit in breakfast every morning and it will help you avoid that mid-afternoon crash.

3. You don’t exercise
It may seem counter intuitive, but exercising produces all kinds of helpful biochemicals that ward off fatigue and help you feel up beat the rest of the time. Think of it as positive feedback: the more energy you put in, the more you get out.

4. You keep poor sleep patterns
Sleepiness is not the same as fatigue (which is a general lack of energy), but one of the most common causes of feeling tired is simply not sleeping enough. In addition to too little shut—eye, keeping irregular sleeping patterns and even sleeping too much can also make you feel tired. To get back on the right track, try to get into a routine of sleeping at consistent times—while only getting as much sleep as you really need—and you’ll be surprised how much better you will feel.

5. You’re carrying extra weight
In addition to making your bones and body bear a greater burden of weight, obesity can result in sleep apnea, which is horribly disruptive to your sleep. According to the Canadian Lung Association, individuals who suffer from sleep apnea can experience pauses in their breathing dozens—or even hundreds—of times in a single night. Sleep apnea can also potentially result in heart problems. If you are concerned about sleep apnea, be sure to speak with your doctor.

6. You might be pregnant
One of the first changes to your body when you’re pregnant—and the most noticeable—is a sudden change to your sleeping habits and energy levels. Pregnancy has a serious impact on your body and feelings of fatigue during your first trimester are very common. If you normally stay up past midnight, then suddenly find yourself wanting to crash out at 9 pm, pregnancy could be a factor. Sleep can also be challenging for new moms, who suddenly have to adjust to the sleep schedule of their baby.

7. You suffer from iron deficiency
A diet low in iron is often to blame for feeling tired—a lack of red meat in the diet of vegetarians and vegans can result in iron deficiency, but it’s unfair and untrue to assume that people who cut out animal products from their diet automatically have low energy levels. People who eat meat can still suffer from low iron as well, especially if they skip on whole—some—though sometimes unappealing—foods like spinach, organ meats, and eggs. Women in particular are prone to anemia because of menstruation, as heavy periods can easily lead to anemia in combination with a low-iron diet.

8. It could signal the onset of diabetes
Diabetes is reaching epidemic levels in America and extreme fatigue or lack of energy can be symptoms of the condition. However, many people who develop type 2 Diabetes will show no symptoms. It is recommended that everyone over the age of 40 have their blood sugar levels tested at least every three years as a precautionary measure.

9. You’ve started a new medication
One of the first changes to your body when you’re pregnant—and the most noticeable—is a sudden change to your sleeping habits and energy levels. Pregnancy has a serious impact on your body and feelings of fatigue during your first trimester are very common. If you normally stay up past midnight, then suddenly find yourself wanting to crash out at 9 pm, pregnancy could be a factor. Sleep can also be challenging for new moms, who suddenly have to adjust to the sleep schedule of their baby.
