Gov. Edwards Makes Proposal to Deal with the Budget Issues

Edwards held a news conference Tuesday afternoon in Baton Rouge to discuss the ongoing meetings his administration has been having to solve two years of critical budget shortfalls. He said the state faces an estimated $750 million shortfall for Fiscal Year 2016 and a shortfall of up to $1.9 billion in Fiscal Year 2017.

“Edwards said. “This is not the budget plan I want to bring in my second week in office, but these problems are bigger than our state has ever seen,” Edwards said.

“In it is now more important than ever for our state’s leaders, citizens, and stakeholders to come together to solve this problem. The last eight years of bad budgeting and annual cuts to vital services have left us in a fragile position. There is no sugar coating that fact,” Gov. Edwards said.

In an effort to deal with the current $750 million shortfall, Gov. John Bel Edwards said he will propose increasing the state sales tax and use the Rainy Day Fund to help deal with Louisiana’s budget woes.
He said he will call the Legislature into a three-week special session in February to address the state's budget crises. Edwards began by addressing his options for how to deal with this year's budget shortfall.

Some of the options include using the state’s Rainy Day Fund, redirecting non-coastal dollars from the first year of BP oil spill payments to the state and cutting at least 10 percent from $1.6 billion in discretionary state funds that are dedicated to certain uses in statute, but not constitutionally protected.

Edwards moved onto how his administration would address the $1.9 billion budget shortfall in 2017. He said the options would provide long-term structural fixes for the way the state funds its government.

“Raising taxes is not my first, second, or even third option when seeking to fill the state’s budget shortfall,” Edwards said. “We must enter a season of shared sacrifice — enormous sacrifice — to fix the systemic budget problems in Louisiana.”

Edwards said his plan includes a bridge to future long-term structural budget improvements for the state. He said the proposal would add one additional cent of state sales tax to the existing four-cent state sales tax, but would not be applied to groceries, prescription drugs and residential utilities. He said the measure would raise $216 million before June 30.

The governor moved on to explaining his administration’s long-term options for dealing with the $1.9 billion shortfall. He said while the drop in oil prices has contributed to the budget woes, the majority of the shortfall comes from lower-than-expected revenue and excessive use of one-time money.

Edwards said his administration will make changes to the income tax brackets in the state. Other long-term options include cuts to the percentage of federal excess itemized deductions Louisiana taxpayers can deduct on their state tax returns and he will propose a constitutional amendment to eliminate the deduction for federal income taxes paid in exchange for lowering individual and corporate tax rates.

A few other long-term proposals to deal with this year’s budget shortfall include raising the tobacco tax to $1.08 per pack of cigarettes, raising other excise taxes, reducing tax credits and making changes to how corporations and business are taxed, Edwards said.

“This is not the budget plan I want to bring in my second week in office, but these problems are bigger than our state has ever seen,” Edwards said. “The challenge before us is one we must address collaboratively and comprehensively in order for our state to prosper again.”

Edwards said he will direct each member of his cabinet to submit proposals for budget reductions based on a minimum 10 percent reduction. He said their budgets would have to reflect the current financial conditions without additional revenue.

With the proposals he plans to introduce, Edwards said the state will stabilize the budget shortfall and minimize severe cuts in the next three months, which would hurt citizens, hospitals, public schools and universities.

“My administration welcomes all constructive engagement in this process. Together we will meet this challenge, stabilize our budget, and build a solid foundation for our state’s future,” he said.

Alden McDonald Delivers Keynote Address at Dedication of Freedman’s Bank Building

WASHINGTON D.C. - Liberty Bank and Trust Company President, Alden McDonald delivered keynote remarks at a U.S. Treasury Department ceremony commemorating the 150th Anniversary of the Freedman’s Savings and Trust Company (Freedman’s Bank).

At the event, the U.S. Treasury dedicated the Treasury Annex Building as the “Freedman’s Bank Building”. The building stands on the site of the original Freedman’s Bank that was created to help newly emancipated slaves integrate into the nation’s economy.

“It is a special treat for me to be on the site of the original Freedman’s Bank and to share with you today the remarkable story of the Freedman’s Bank,” said McDonald, “Liberty was founded in 1972, following what I like to call the 2nd Civil War – The Civil Rights Movement of the 1960’s.”

Today, there are approximately 25 African American owned institutions in the United States, including Liberty Bank and Trust. During the great recession of 2008, these institutions served some of the most economically challenged markets in the country. McDonald affirmed that African American financial institutions continue to face challenges relative to earnings, capital, and costs, but many continue to improve and have been very successful in serving the African American populations and low-and moderate-income Americans.

“We have learned how to effectively serve disadvantaged communi- ties, build credit worthiness, and expand economic opportunity for small businesses and young professionals,” continued McDonald, “and we understand that we have to be engaged in providing great opportunities for the people we serve.” McDonald concluded his speech challenging the Treasury Department, members of Congress and other guest to continue the quest for inclusive prosperity, “We are stewards of a sacred American legacy that every man and woman has the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Let’s make future generations proud of what we accomplish together”.

The Freedman’s Bank was established in 1865 to create an opportunity for wealth-building among the nation’s four million newly emancipated African-Americans. During its nearly 10-year existence, approximately 100,000 African-American individuals and institutions amassed $57 million (equivalent to $115 Billion today) in the bank’s Washington, D.C. headquarters and its branches in 37 cities across 17 states. Despite the closing of the Freedman’s Bank in 1874, it remains a significant part of American history and this event will highlight the historical significance of the bank and its original mission – to promote economic integration and financial inclusion.

NORDC Teen Council To Host Mardi Gras Masquerade Ball

NEW ORLEANS – On Friday, Jan. 22, 2016, the New Orleans Recreation Development Commission (NORDC) and Chevron will host a Mardi Gras Masquerade Ball. Led by the NORDC Teen Council, this free event will feature music by DJ Chicken, a photo booth, food, a special musical guest and the election of the 2016 Teen Council Mardi Gras Court. All Orleans Parish teens, ages 12-17, are invited to celebrate a happy and safe Mardi Gras with members of the NORDC Teen Council.

Supported by Chevron, the NORDC Teen Council empowers youth, ages 12 to 17, by developing a social growth environment through structured teen programs. These emerging leaders actively participate in civic and community engagement by designing and implementing citywide teen programming. At each monthly NORDC meeting, a teen is selected to address the commission with a report on recent and current activities. The teens also speak personally about what the Teen Council means to them.

Select NORDC Teen Council members are chosen for the Chevron Future Leaders Program, which offers an array of monthly learning activities, events and trips. The program supports professional leadership and skills development and enables early career exploration.

The State of the Union Address: Class Act, Crass Responses

Julianne Malveaux
NNPA Columnist

President Obama did his thing when he delivered the State of the Union address (SOUT) on Tuesday night. There was confidence in his speech, some off-the-cuff humor and a little swagger when he rattled off his accomplishments and asserted that the SOUT is “strong.” While I disagree with parts of the address, especially around economic issues, I was delighted with the President’s forceful tone, and with his insistence of being “strong.”

How did this happen? The emergency manager — accountable only to the governor and state officials — decided to save money by switching Flint’s water supply from Lake Huron to a cheaper source, the Flint River. Only the river had been poisoned by waste from nearby factories for generations. The toxic wastes not only turned the water brown, it corroded the aged pipes of Flint’s water system, unleashing lead into the water. Federal law required that the water be treated, but that would have cost $100 a day, so it was not done.

Parents began to complain of rashes and hair loss. The state’s environmental quality agency denied there was a problem. High-level state officials knew that the water supply was lead poisoned for six months before declaring an emergency. Finally, a Flint pediatrician tested the blood of children and discovered lead levels double and even triple the prior amounts. State officials denounced her work before realizing the truth could no longer be hidden.

Finally, Gov. Snyder ended the denial. He declared an official emergency, and four days later called for delivering bottled water. The head of his environmental agency resigned. Snyder apologized for the catastrophe, but calls for him to resign continue to build.

Flint is not alone. Across America, in ghettos and barrios, reservations and rural valleys, the poor are isolated and too often forgotten. Systems basic to civilization — plumbing, water systems, school houses, garbage collection and treatment, roads and public transport — are in squall, lacking even the investment to keep them up to minimum standards. Impoverished neighborhoods often lack hospitals, grocery stores, and decent public spaces. The poor are left to fend for themselves, rising to attention only when violence breaks out, when innocents are shot, when tragedies like Flint become public.

The cost of this callousness — in lives lost, disease, mental damage, emotional damage.

Resilience and compassion are rising in the face of this callousness. The President humbly shared “one of the few regrets of my presidency” — that the rancor and suspicion between the parties has gotten worse instead of better.

President Obama appeals to our common sense, to our better selves, to the notion that we are all in this together in the name of our democracy. “Democracy grinds to a halt to the notion that we are all in this together, transcending party lines, for the good of our nation.” As he always does, he feels their voice doesn’t matter; that democracy is rigged in favor of the rich or the powerful or some special interest.

And most of all, democracy breaks worse instead of better. “Democracy grinds to a halt to the notion that we are all in this together, transcending party lines, for the good of our nation.” As he always does, he feels their voice doesn’t matter; that democracy is rigged in favor of the rich or the powerful or some special interest.

The President said many of the right things about education, women’s issues, income inequality, and immigration; he could have said things differently, but one doesn’t expect policy details from a SOU Address. I guess it is too much to ask that our President address the African American community, even in a sentence. As I listened to the speech, I hoped that, in this last address, the President might acknowledge his staunchest supporters.

While President Obama exuded nothing but class, it was amazing to watch the very crude House Speaker Paul Ryan behaving like a bored child. He was mostly inexpressive, but he also fidgeted, rolled his eyes, and at one point put his hand to his nose (I think — maybe he was picking it), as if he could not be but so bothered. He never clapped nor cracked a smile at a joke. He behaved as if like he didn’t want to be there.

There was more Republican crass. Are we surprised that Donald Trump was sour? Or that Marco Rubio (R-FL), the invisible Senator who deigned show up for SOU had little relevant to say? At the same time, there was some Republican class. South Carolina governor Nikki Haley offered a well-delivered and gracious partisan response to the SOU. Some of her comments echoed those of President Obama when she noted, “People think that you have to be the loudest voice in the room to make a difference. That is just not true. Often, the best thing we can do is turn down the volume. When the sound is quieter, you can actually hear what someone else is saying. And that can make a world of difference.”

Both Governor Haley and President Obama are asking for civility in political discourse, and the loudest voices are rejecting that. Republicans attacked Haley because she said that Republicans needed to own their part in the “erosion of public trust.” President Obama optimistically declared the SOU “strong.” Crass responses to Nikki Haley’s comments suggest that the SOU is disrupted and weakened by the toxic nature of political discourse.

The African American State of the Union

Benjamin Chavis

Today we remain disproportionately incarcerated in America’s jails and prisons: women, men, and young juveniles are overflowing behind bars. There is an urgent demand for criminal justice reform without further delay or debate. Mass incarceration is a reality for Black America that needs to be challenged and ended.

The spending and annual consumerism of African Americans continues to exceed $1.2 trillion. Our “State of the Union” indicates glaringly that we are big spenders, but we are not big savers or investors. The economic development of our families and communities is really in our own hands. As we begin 2016, there is no greater urgency than for all of us to do more to attend to how to advance the economic sustainability of our communities.

The high quality education of our children has to be at the top of our priority list for next year and beyond. Yes, also “Black Minds Matter.” I highly recommend that you take the time to read and get an update about an ongoing study in the state of California that I believe will have a significant impact on national education policies and programs that are focused on the education of African American children and others who still have to grapple with inequality and inequities in the nation’s educational system.

“Black Minds Matter: Supporting the Educational Success of Black Children in California, examines how the nearly 1 million Black youth in California are faring from preschool through college and reveals the distressing disparities that newly released state and national data show persist at all levels of their educational journey. The report also highlights the groundbreaking efforts underway to reverse these trends in California and close achievement and opportunity gaps for African American students.” We need a national study done based on the model developed in California.

The State of Union for African Americans simply means we have to continue to struggle for freedom, justice, equality and empowerment. We have to build alliances and coalitions to achieve progress and to maximize our continued presence and contributions to make the nation and the world a better place. But it all starts not with the government or with some outside benevolent factor.

It starts with African Americans. It starts with each one of us taking more responsibility for the improvements of our families. Yes, we have made progress! Yes, there is still much to be done. But there is many more opportunities than there are problems to move forward. The glass is not half empty, it is half full. A Luta Continua!

crime, drugs, hopelessness — are immense. This isn’t about money. We pay more on the back end — in prisons and emergency rooms, cops and guards, prisons and addiction centers — than we would have to spend on the front-end investments that would give every child a chance.

Conservatives continue to call for dismantling environmental regulations. They slash budgets for policing violations by corporations or cities. They want to slash support for poverty programs and block-grant them to the states and localities. The next time you hear that rap, think of Flint. Its poorest children betrayed by state officials. Think of Flint deprived of safe water in order to save a few bucks. Think of Flint and investigate your own community — the horrors of Flint are not exclusive to that city.
Best Friends Forever

By The Bookworm Sez

You’d do almost anything for your best friend.

You’d take a bullet, take her in, or take her anywhere she needed to go. You keep her kids and her confidenc-es. And, as in the new novel, “Best Friends Forever” by Kimberla Lawson Roby, she’d do the same for you. Probably.

Celine Richardson was absolutely furious at her hus-band, Keith.

It was bad enough that he came home at 5 a.m., but lying about where he’d been was the last straw. It was obvious that Keith was cheating on Celine – but what Celine couldn’t figure out was why.

He claimed that she acted like she never had time for him, and Celine had to admit that she’d been awfully busy for the last few months. Build-ing her business took a lot of her time, but didn’t they have date nights? Sure, she’d been preoccu-pied now and then, but when they sent their ten-year-old daughter, Kassie, to spend the weekend with Celine’s best friend, Lauren, didn’t Celine and Keith spend alone-time together?

Friendship, as you know, is never one-sided. It’s a give-and-take, and that includes “Best Friends Forever.”

“Best Friends Forever” by Kimberla Lawson Roby

They did, but that wasn’t good enough for him. He was cheating on Celine with some tramp, but he wouldn’t come out and admit it.

And yet – that wasn’t the worst thing in Celine’s life.

Just a few days before Keith’s first lie, she found a lump in her breast and, after rounds of doctor visits and too many tests, her worst fears were confirmed. It was malign-ant, but Keith was full of ex-cuses why he couldn’t accompany her to the hospital and Celine knew instantly that she could never again rely on her husband for support. Still, she wasn’t alone. With the help of her best friend and her brother - and no thanks to her no-good, absent husband - she’d be just fine.

But Keith wasn’t done, and neither was cancer. Celine’s recovery didn’t go well, and her soon-to-be-ex had had a bombshell to share, one that she sensed wasn’t the whole story. And just when Celine thought she couldn’t take any more, Lauren spoke her mind...

And the takeaway? I liked it, and I think you will, too: readers get a great girlfriends novel that’s easy to read, super-quick to finish, and that can happily be passed around or recommended for a book group.

If that sounds like a dream read for you, then get “Best Friends Forever.” It could be a book you’ll do anything for.

Rob McConnell, the manager for body engineering at the Toyota Technical Center said that he often draws inspiration from the fashion industry.

“A little secret, hopefully no one is recording, but me and my wife sit and watch ‘Project Runway,’” McConnell told a small group of Black journalists at the North American International Auto Show in Detroit. “Yeah, I’ll admit it.”

McConnell said that, in a lot of ways, fashion designers are engineers.

“It’s all connected. You gotta pull from a lot of different places to get your inspiration, your ideas,” said McConnell. “You gotta come up with something new. That means you have to look outside the box.”

McConnell said that he gets excited about the fashion industry and how we can marry the fashion industry to the development and design of the vehicle and how we can execute it through engineering.

McConnell discovered that he was passionate about design at an early age, as he played with Matchbox cars, Hot Wheels and Legos. He also competed in the Boy Scouts’ pinewood derby.

“‘That’s engineering and that’s design,’” said McConnell. “‘That’s the biggest challenge that we have when we’re kids, realizing that this excitement may actually lead to bigger and better things.’

For McConnell, those bigger and better things included a 15-year (and counting) professional career at the Japanese automaker and a number of United States patents related to his work. According to a company biography, McConnell served as the “project design lead for multiple North America Production vehicles including the dramatically restyled 2013 Toyota Avalon.”

McConnell was also the team leader for the body and exterior for the 2014 Toyota Camry, Toyota Sienna, Toyota Venza, and Toyota Tundra. Now he manages exterior lighting development for vehicles like the Toyota Camry and Toyota Avalon.

McConnell noted that eyewear has risen as a fashion statement in recent years.

“A lot of people have turned what’s functional into a fashion element and that’s something that you can execute in a car. How do we do that? We do that in the headlights,” said McConnell. “The headlights are a statement, they are a signature, they are the eyes of the vehicle, and with the 2016 Toyota Avalon, we refined the daytime running lights.”

McConnell said that when you see the 2016 Toyota Avalon coming down the road or in your review mirror, you know exactly what it is and his goal was to create a memorable experience for Toyota customers.

“Your eyes can tell a story and the eyes of the vehicle can tell a story,” said McConnell. “They speak to the depths of the vehicle and the soul of the vehicle and that’s what I hope to accomplish with the future vehicles that I work on.”

McConnell suggested that young people who are interested in going into engineering or automotive design should sharpen their critical thinking skills, get involved in team projects, or even work on cars in an effort to expose themselves to the opportunities that are out there. He said that students in middle school and high school need to think about college and their careers as early as they can.

“McConnell continued: “The key point is that you gotta open your mind and it’s really about understanding the opportunities that are out there. You may get into it and decide that you don’t want to go into engineering, but it might spawn your thought to go in a different direction, which is really the push.”
